Question - 5:

Why should you support employee initiatives at workplace?

Ans:

Complement and support employee initiative. Implementing a company-wide change that one employee has made will encourage other workers to follow the lead of their colleague. You will also send the signal that employees need not be afraid to try new ideas and go the extra mile. Listening to employees and encouraging them to find solutions to problems they encounter gives them a sense of ownership of their jobs and a sense of accomplishment when their initiative results in real change.

Question - 6:

Why should you give employees the freedom to take initiative at workplace?

Ans:

When employees feel they have the latitude to try new endeavors, they probably will. Let employees know they can make changes to the workplace in a way that improves their ability to do their jobs well. Encourage big or small changes depending on what works for your company. You might discover that employees who are free to make their jobs easier will spend more time doing their job and will take the initiative to do it better.

Question - 7:

Tell me how would you inspire initiative at workplace?

Ans:

Doing less might be the key to inspiring initiative. If you let employees come up with workplace solutions, their innovation might surprise you. Small businesses owners in particular can benefit from this dedication during the start-up phase and through periods of company growth.

Question - 8:

How would you deliver results for building and maintaining credibility for the initiative at workplace?

Ans:

Best way of building credibility is to make initiatives successful so that others feel good about the efforts they put in. Effective people make sure that the percentage of initiatives that succeed is very high. This is done by picking the right ones and then creating right environment and team to make it successful.

View All Answers

Question - 9:

How would you give credit and take blame for building and maintaining credibility for the initiative at workplace?

Ans:

Effective people understand that since people go out of their regular work schedule to work on initiatives most of the time, they need positive reinforcement all the time. One of the best ways to do this is to give credit when it is due, rather than taking all the limelight when initiative succeeds. Also, it means taking the blame if things go wrong rather than letting others bear the brunt of someone's ire. This generates the respect and good faith that is needed for people to sign up for initiatives with effective people.

View All Answers

Question - 10:

How would you be transparent in building and maintaining credibility for the initiative at workplace?

Ans:

Effective people are transparent about why they pick initiatives and are always willing to explain the benefits of an initiative. Their actions support their reasoning and helps people see that the intention is to really solve a problem and not to take undue advantage of others.

View All Answers

Question - 11:

How would you build and maintain credibility for initiative at workplace?

Ans:

Initiatives depend on others spending time on work that is not directly assigned to them and sometimes may not even benefit them directly. So the people who take initiatives rely a lot on their own credibility and leadership to get others to work on their initiatives. Building and maintaining credibility is absolute must for sustained initiative-taking. Effective people do so very deliberately, by doing these things:

- * Being Transparent
- * Give Credit and take blame
- * Delivering Results

Question - 12:

How would you make sure you can produce results for initiative at workplace?

Ans:

Most initiatives take additional time and effort from involved persons. If this is not available or can not be created, even important initiatives can fail. So effective people make sure that people who need to contribute have enough time and resources to do so (by talking to their managers, by inspiring them to work extra hours, by re-prioritizing regularly scheduled work, etc).

View All Answers

Question - 13:

How would you clear goals and measure the success for using initiative at workplace?

Ans:

Once they pick a problem to solve, effective people define the goals and measure of success very clearly. This helps in scoping the problem and effort requirements. Without clear definitions, most initiatives will end up sucking lots of time with no results to show, causing failures.

View All Answers

Question - 14:

Tell me about right problems to solve for using initiative at workplace?

Ans:

The problem on surface is seldom the problem that requires solving. Effective people spend time in understanding the underlying cause of the problems they see and then resolve them. They also keep in mind their basic goals for solving a given problem and are willing to think holistically all the time.

View All Answers

Question - 15:

Please give an example of taking initiative to solve any problem at workplace?

Ans:

Taking initiative to solve specific problems is still one of the best ways of being effective.

Example:

If your project has too many requirement changes coming in every week, one way to solve this problem might be to stay in close contact with the product managers and change as quickly as requirements come but effective people probe it further and may realize that things are changing because product manager has been meeting with customers without understanding our own capabilities and hence just passes on the requirements without understanding or validating. They then go one step further and help to the product manager by attending the customer meetings, explaining the product and current plan of record and how it solves all of their problems, provides one on one training to product manager and creating a set of slides for the product manager to understand and use for next time.

Question - 16:

Tell me is it hard to take initiative at workplace?

Ans:

Taking initiative is hard:

* Since it is taking something beyond your regular work, it requires extra time investment which few people seem to have in today's busy organizations.

* It requires risk taking and results may not always be there, so an organization too focused on fixing problems and eradicating failure may actually penalize initiative-takers in many cases.

Question - 17:

What are the characteristics for improving initiative at workplace?

Ans:

Improving your ability to show initiative in the workplace is as simple as looking at how you work and asking yourself a few key questions, according to job search online. Do you make suggestions at meetings? Have you asked for extra assignments? Have you tried to fix problems before taking them to your supervisor or have you started new assignments before you are told? Are you any good at communicating openly with your supervisor? Managers often notice employees who exhibit these traits. Executives are more likely to promote employees who ask for more responsibility.

Question - 34:

Do you think that initiative is now sneered in the workplace?

Ans:

Part of being a successful member of a work team is being sensitive to the needs and emotional dynamics of other team members. While it is certainly true that a lack of job security in the current work environment has many people feeling anxious, there is always been mixed feeling about colleagues who make the rest of us look bad. I would say you can learn from this recent experience and try to avoid the high profile kind of initiatives that make others defensive.

Question - 36:

Tell me about a suggestion that you made to your supervisor recently?

Ans:

I work in orders and the company was launching a new product. The sales team had in-depth training on it but we had none. I suggested that the orders department should also receive the training so that we would understand what was being ordered and be able to answer any questions if necessary. It was agreed we would all undergo a short version of the training.

Question - 40:

Please tell me what is a workplace?

Ans:

The workplace is the physical location where someone works. Such a place can range from a home office to a large office building or factory. The workplace is one of the most important social spaces other than the home, constituting a central concept for several entities, the worker and his/her family, the employing organization, the customers of the organization and the society as a whole. The development of new communication technologies have led to the development of the virtual workplace, a workplace that is not located in any one physical space.
