Tell me how do you handle conflict?

Ans:

Yes. I worked in customer service for a long time. When I worked in casinos I would have disagreements with players on the outcome of a game. I would usually listen to their side of the story. Then I would see if there was a chance I could have been mistaken, which would usually mean calling our surveillance team to review the hand. If it was determined that the player was mistaken, I would talk to them and explain to them the reason we came to that decision. If they were still upset I would try to diffuse them by offering them something within my power to offer them, like something to eat or tickets to our drawing or something like that. I realize that sometimes it doesn't matter if you're right, you still need to give a little.

Question - 42:

8 Most Important Things You Should Never Do During An Interview:

Ans:

With the job market extremely tight, even the small stuff counts, especially when you're on a job interview. That's why it's so important not to say or do the wrong things, since that first impression could end up being the last one.

With that in mind, here are seven deadly sins of job interviewing.

* 1. Don't Be Late To the Interview

* Even if your car broke down or the train derailed, do everything you can to get to that job interview on time. "If you have a legitimate excuse it's still hard to bounce back," says Pamela Skillings, co-founder of job coaching firm Skillful Communications. "People are suspicious because they hear the same excuses all the time."

* On the flip side, you don't want to show up too early and risk appearing desperate, but you do want to be there at least five minutes early or at the very least on time.

* 2. Don't Show Up Unprepared

* It seems simple, but countless people go on job interviews knowing very little about the company they are interviewing with when all it would take is a simple Google search to find out. As a result, they end up asking obvious questions, which signal to the interviewer that they are too lazy to prepare.

* "Don't ask if the company is public or private, how long it's been in business and where they do their manufacturing," says Mark Jaffe, president of Wyatt & Jaffe, the executive search firm. "Sharpen your pencil before you go to school."

* 3. Don't Ask About Salary, Benefits, Perks

* Your initial interview with a company shouldn't be about what the company can do for you, but what you can do for the company. Which means the interview isn't the time to ask about the severance package, vacation time or health plan. Instead you should be selling yourself as to why the company can't live without you.

* "Your interest should be about the job and what your responsibilities will be," says Terry Pile, Principal Consultant of Career Advisors. "Asking about vacation, sick leave, pension, salary and benefits should be avoided at all costs."

* 4. Don't Focus On Future Roles Instead Of The Job At Hand

* The job interview is not the time or place to ask about advancement opportunities or how to become the CEO. You need to be interested in the job you are actually interviewing for. Sure, a company wants to see that you are ambitious, but they also want assurances you are committed to the job you're being hired for. "You can't come with an agenda that this job is just a stepping stone to bigger and better things," says Jaffe.

* 5. Don't Turn The Weakness Question Into A Positive

* To put it bluntly, interviewers are not idiots. So when they ask you about a weakness and you say you work too hard or you are too much of a perfectionist, chances are they are more apt to roll their eyes than be blown away. Instead, be honest and come up with a weakness that can be improved on and won't ruin your chances of getting a job.

* For instance, if you are interviewing for a project management position, it wouldn't be wise to say you have poor organizational skills, but it's ok to say you want to learn more shortcuts in Excel. "Talk about the skills you don't have that will add value, but aren't required for the job," says Pile.

* 6. Don't Lie

* Many people think it's ok to exaggerate their experience or fib about a firing on a job interview, but lying can be a surefire way not to get hired. Even if you get through the interview process with your half truths, chances are you won't be equipped to handle the job you were hired to do. Not to mention the more you lie the more likely you are to slip up.

* "Don't exaggerate, don't make things bigger than they are and don't claim credit for accomplishments you didn't do," says Jaffe. "You leave so much room in your brain if you don't have to fill it with which lie you told which person."

* 7. Don't Ask If There's Any Reason You Shouldn't Be Hired

* Well meaning career experts will tell you to close your interview by asking if there is any reason you wouldn't be hired. While that question can give you an idea of where you stand and afford you the opportunity to address any concerns, there's no guarantee the interviewer is going to be truthful with you or has even processed your information enough to even think about that.

* "All you are doing is prompting them to think about what's wrong with you,"

* 8. Don't make assumptions about the interviewer.

* If someone seems junior -- whether by appearance or title -- don't assume they are the low man or woman on the totem pole with no decision-making power. "Your misjudgment will be apparent if you insinuate that you are more experienced [or qualified] than him or her. For all you know, the interviewer may be one of the youngest graduates ever of an Ivy League school, or he/she is being groomed for an executive management position within the organization". If the interviewer feels belittled, you won't get his or her approval. Even if you're right about their status, they'll still pass on their sentiments to the person in charge.

Question - 43:

Tell me how good is your driving record?

Ans:

Don't mention about your record of being caught by traffic police every week, and don't even say that you were never caught. Both your answers will never give you the job. Just say them that you were caught once when you broke some traffic rules to urgently admit some person in a hospital. Such reasons will add a good impression.

View All Answers

Question - 44:

Tell me what are your views on a responsible driver?

Ans:

A responsible driver never upsets his passengers, and he knows very well about driving, traffic rules and the city. If sometime there is some accident with his car then he does not run away but take responsibilities of his car and his passengers.

In-case if you are applying for a delivery job then just say them the responsibility of the driver is to deliver the products at the given place safely before time.

Question - 45:

Explain me do you have any mechanical knowledge regarding vehicles?

Ans:

This is good if you really know to deal with technical failures in cars, but I advise you to say the truth. If you lie today, they will catch you for this sometime in the future and if you fail there then you are surely going to be fired.

Question - 46:

Tell me how Much Education and Experience Do You Have?

Ans:

In order to drive a bus for either the city or a school system, you must be properly licensed. You should be sure to bring this license with you to present to your interviewer. Next, be truthful about the amount of experience you have. If you have only driven a bus a few times, you should never try to bluff. Be honest about the amount of experience you have but be sure to mention your safety record, particularly if it is impeccable. Your ability to keep your passengers safe will be your interviewer's primary concern.

Question - 54:

Do You Mind Working Nights and Weekends?

Ans:

You will generally be asked this question only if you are applying for a position driving a city bus. In larger cities, buses run well into the night-sometimes even 24 hours a day. You may be given a midnight shift due to your lack of seniority, or scheduling may require that you work swing shifts. This is not the time to discuss your personal scheduling needs, however. Replying with a statement such as "I do not mind working nights or weekends and I am always available" will suffice. This is exactly what your potential employer wants to hear since your flexibility will help the bus system stay on schedule.

Tell me if a kid throws up, while in route to school, how would you handle the situation?

Ans:

I would safely pull the bus over, secure the bus, remove the key and give the student that got sick a pan if available in case they get sick again. I would have the student move to the front of the bus, most likely let the school know that this student was sick, so they could contact the parent. Clean the area as best I could to get back of the road and get the students to school.

Question - 67:

Tell me how would you rate your ability to drive a bus at night? How do you handle night shifts?

Ans:

Staying awake at night is not something natural for a human being so night shifts are obviously more difficult than day shifts. However, if one gets sufficient rest and sleep during the day, night shifts are not too difficult to manage. On a scale of one to ten, I would rate my ability to drive a bus at night at 8.
